Profile: Adrian Sassoon

25 April 2024

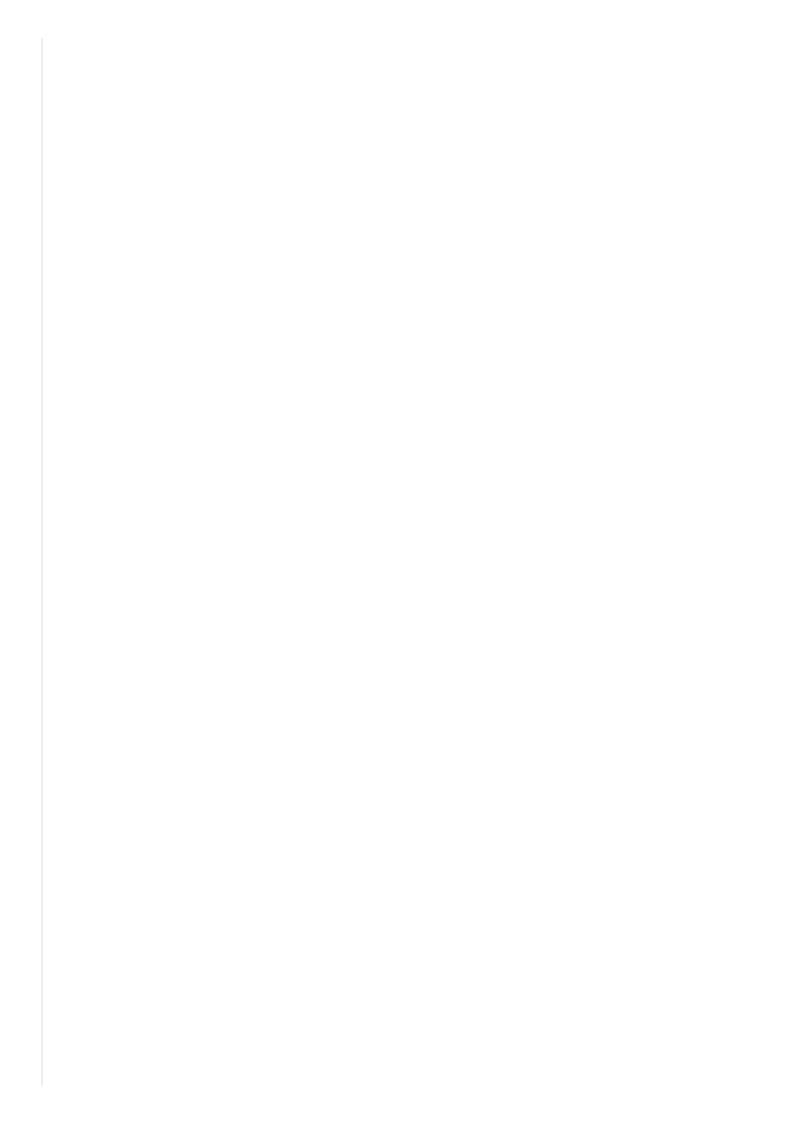

By Emma Chrichton-Miller

Emma Crichton-Miller is Editor-in-Chief of The Design Edit, and an arts journalist, editor and writer. She contributes regularly to the Financial Times and is a columnist on Apollo Magazine.

For dealer Adrian Sassoon, the UK's leading dealer in Contemporary Works of Art and Antique French Porcelain, art fairs are critical. Without a gallery space, it is his reassuring presence over many years at art fairs from Maastricht to Paris to London, New York and, last year, Miami, that has confirmed his reputation for excellence and consistency. At leading fairs he displays on serried shelves and central plints the latest creations of his virtuoso glass, ceramics and metalwork artists. Crucial to his display each time, Sassoon explains, is not just that all the works on display by both eighteenth century and contemporary makers conform to his acacting standards, but that there is new work: "Our artists don't make the same thing again and again. They move on. Even with contemporary objects you can weave patterns of development over a twenty, or even twenty five year period."

don who had his work. Cons."	temporary Applied Arts was in Co	at galleries in Doublon and elsewi	e would be a nice piece of glass	and a nice piece of this and a	rran whose work was in the vec. nice piece of that and so I had sta	A collection. I was aware of galle rted collecting, when I was in my Courtes	of French 18th Century Early Hard-Paste Sèvres Porcelair sy of Adrian Sassoon time Sassoon returned to London, he had a small collection			ander & Bevendt with its facus on French (	Sorman and Italian firmiture all 17th and 18t stood u they we	th century. But in 1994 he launched on his own, making his p straight I'd hit my head on the bottom of the stairs. I was eren't used to seeing."	first fair appearance at the British Ceramics Col literally not even on a shelf but underneath the s	nference held in the Dorchester Hotel. "I tairs." Nevertheless he managed to draw	That first stand there was so small that it was v attention, with people "realising that they w	actually underneath the stairs and if I vere looking at very fine things that have so art." Hi	n credits his connoisseurship, rooted in eighteenth century p ome level of awareness of what has happened historically, o is schooling in Sèvres also opened his eyes to the possibiliti or metal workers like Junko Mori and Hiroshi Susuki.	therwise you get confused. If something is newly	made it does not prove that it is a new	idea. You cannot understand or judge conte	mporary art if you disregard historic

Black Pumpkin, 2023 Kate Malone Courtesy of Adrian Sassoon  Sassoon freely admits that he is drawn to highly finished, technically accomplished work: "My taste is for the shinier, smarter type of porcelain, glassy, silver object. I am personally not so interested in asymmetrical volcanic firings and seeing how a piece of ceramic can lean one way in the kiln. I like things that, when they exit the kiln, are pretty much as the artist intended." It also suits him to show work within a context where art and architecture also play a role: "One of the keys to collecting is that if you want to mix things, they must be of a similar quality. The architecture is just as much part of the collecting as anything else. I always thought that having paintings by Rubens and furniture by Chippendale on the other stands in the show was quite good company!" In this way, he wants visitors to his stand not to be impressed by his own curation but already dreaming of the spaces they have at home waiting to be enhanced by his art works.

